Germans fear that climate change harms political stability in other countries and thus affect trade, induce migration, and ultimately causes conflict. Talking to a delegation from China, R. Andreas Kraemer of Ecologic Institute describes Germany's new energy solutions, effective domestic policies, and promotion of good climate policy abroad.

The presentation outlines Germany's current transformation in energy policy, focusing mainly on energy production from renewable sources and measures promoting energy efficiency, and explains how responses to the challenges of climate change are exported through cooperation with other EU member states, energy exporters and the establishment of bilateral links.

An abridged version of the presentation is available for download in English [2] [pdf, 68 kB] and Chinese [3] [pdf, 230 kB].
